Summary

The present thesis is an exploration of Thomas Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary and an effort to understand how Viennese theologians coped with the conflict between theology and philosophy in a plural religious context in the first decades of the XVth century. Engaging in such an inquiry by focusing on a hitherto neglected Viennese figure of the XVth century can provide a deeper understanding of the mechanisms involved in the influence of the historical sphere on academic discourse and the transmission of knowledge.

The novelty of my inquiry comes from the primary sources that make up the object of my research, including Thomas Ebendorfer's hitherto unstudied and unedited Sentences commentary, preserved in various manuscripts from the Austrian National Library (Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek) in Vienna. Given the philosophical and theological character of these sources, these texts have the potential to shed new light on the academic discourse at the Viennese Faculty of Theology in the first two decades of the XVth century, providing at the same time a missing link in the doctrinal evolution of the genre of Sentences commentaries.

I have chosen to approach this inquiry through the lens of Thomas Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary for two main reasons. Firstly, he lectured on the Sentences during 1420-1421, i.e. a period that overlaps with the Hussite wars and the persecution of Viennese Jews. Secondly, despite being a well known figure of the XVth century and an extremely prolific historian and theologian, Ebendorfer composed a commentary on the Sentences which has been virtually neglected by previous scholarship.

In answering the main research question stated above, I will explore the following three research sub-questions.

1. One of the sub-questions of my research is to what extent did Ebendorfer cut off with the VGC tradition. More precisely, I will investigate to what degree is he still anchored in the VGC tradition and what are the new topics that he approached or the new manners in which he responded to older questions. Particular attention will be paid to the manner in which Ebendorfer employs passages from previous authors, especially those authors that also represent a main source of inspiration for the previous Viennese Sentences commentaries from the VGC.

2. A second sub-question equally important for my study asks what is Ebendorfer's conception on the relation between theology and philosophy. I will analyze Ebendorfer's stance on this topic by considering his two Prologues, found in ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4369, ff. 7r-8v, and ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4387, ff. 3v-23r, respectively.

3. A third sub-question of my research asks if there is a connection between contemporary historical events and Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary. More precisely, in investigating how Ebendorfer tried to cope with the conflict between theology and philosophy, I have also questioned the possible influence of the historical sphere on the ideas Ebendorfer puts forth in his commentary. It is possible that this question will also provide a reason why Ebendorfer departed from the VGC. For this inquiry, I follow two questions: what type of attitude does Ebendorfer have towards infidels and heretics and whether his attitude towards religious alterity influenced his conception on the relation between theology and philosophy.

My hypothesis is that the progressive separation between theology and philosophy is tied to certain historical events of the XVth century, a period when the unity of Christianity was marked not only by internal threats efforts to put an end to the Great Schism, but also by the external threat of heretics, such as the Hussites, with whom the Jews were seen to be conspiring. Studying Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary can thus provide some answers regarding the manner in which Christians attempted to rationalize their ideas and beliefs concerning Jews and Hussites at a very intricate point in history. It is my hypothesis that Ebendorfer departed from the VGC tradition by adapting older ideas to the most pressing issues of his time.

In order to respond to all these questions, I will employ a methodology that is traditionally used when dealing with a previously unexplored Sentences commentary. This method involves reading the whole text preserved in manuscripts and gathering relevant information that allows a better understanding of paleographical and doctrinal aspects of his text.

1. One dimension of this inquiry is compiling a list of questions for each four Books (tabula quaestionum).¹ Employing this methodology in the case of Ebendorfer's commentary² will give an overview of his text, allowing a clarification of chronology. Moreover, it will bring

² The manuscripts containing different redactions of Ebendorfer's commentary that I have read are: ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4369, ff. 1r-405v (Books I and IV); ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4387, ff. 1r-415v (Books I and II); ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4393, ff. 1r-44r (Book II); ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4590, ff. 1r-22v (Book III).

to light those topics that Ebendorfer is most interested in, and by a general comparison of his text to other Viennese Sentences commentaries from the VGC, I will be able to grasp the new subjects Ebendorfer approaches. This preliminary step in investigating his commentary offers a direction regarding the philosophical themes that are worth exploring in greater detail and could be critically edited.

2. A second dimension of this methodology is providing a complete citation list of all scholastic authors ranging from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century who are explicitly mentioned in Ebendorfer's commentary.³ Such an inquiry provides an overview of his sources, which ultimately allows for some preliminary conclusions concerning his doctrinal profile.

3. A third dimension of my methodology is providing a list of all of Ebendorfer's explicit references to heterodox groups, such as Jews and Hussites.⁴ This constitutes a starting point for exploring the third research question concerning his attitude towards religious alterity in general. The aim of this inventory is also to give a complete mapping of the loci where themes particularly related to Jews and Judaism are usually treated in a Sentences commentary.

4. A fourth dimension of my methodology is critically editing several texts including the following: all the Viennese versions of the VGC for question 2 of the Prologue⁵, Ebendorfer's two Prologues⁶, and several hitherto unknown texts gathered in codex Basel, Universitätsbibliothek A-X-44, a medieval notebook in which Henry of Rheinfelden gathered texts stemming from the Viennese milieux. Taking under consideration this latter source allows a better contextualization of Ebendorfer's ideas that are tied to the Viennese context.

In chapter 1, I have offered a historical overview on „Society and Academic Discourse in XVth century Vienna”. More importantly, after a complete reading of the various versions of Thomas Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary, I was able to put forth a series of conclusions concerning several aspects of his text. Regarding the nature of Ebendorfer's commentary, I established that Ebendorfer read Horaw's commentary on Book I as a sententiarius (annotating it in the margin of his own copy), and that he proceeded in a similar manner for the remaining books (II, III and IV), i.e. by reading other versions of the 'VGC' and annotating them in the margin. I have also made a tabula quaestionum (see Appendix 1) for all versions of Ebendorfer's commentary, showing that for each version of the 'VGC' that he read as a sententiarius, he also composed a supplementum/complementum, i.e., additional set of questions on the same book, written in his own hand, which he usually attached to the version of the ‘VGC’ he read. I also concluded that textually the first Prologue, the one preserved in ms. Wien, ÖNB 4369, is completely different from the Viennese Prologues of the ‘VGC’. More precisely, Ebendorfer composed an original Prologue as a sententiarius, while his second Prologue, which is part of his Lectura secunda, only partially supports such a conclusion. I have thus confirmed Brînzei’s and Schabel’s initial claim that Ebendorfer’s text should not be included in the ‘VGC’ tradition. In fact, in both of his Prologues Ebendorfer moves away from the topics traditionally discussed in the VGC, because of his preoccupation with heresy. If previous Viennese prologues from the VGC asked whether theology is a science and whether it is a practical or speculative science, Ebendorfer asks in his first Prologue a different question, namely „whether in theology, ruler and mistress of all other sciences, can be found a false sentence according to the virtue of speech.”

2. In the second chapter I have analysed the manner in which Ebendorfer treats the subject of theology as science and theology as a practical science in the effort of trying to respond to the question whether Ebendorfer broke off with the ‘Vienna Group Commentary’ tradition in these particular points. Regarding the debate whether theology is a science – a topic which was discussed in virtually all Viennese Sentences commentaries from the beginning of the XVth century, I have concluded that Ebendorfer aligns himself to the Viennese stance and the VGC common attempt to salvage the scientific status of theology by keeping its designation as scientia, even if not in the proper sense of the term (since already for Dinkelsbühl, the scientific feature that theology shares with science, namely that it “compels assent”, sufficed for calling theology scientia).

Regarding the debate whether theology is a practical or a speculative habit – again a topic discussed virtually in all Viennese Sentences commentaries from the beginning of the XVth century, Ebendorfer supports the practical nature of theology. On the basis of a diplomatic edition of q. 2 of ‘VGC’ Prologues (pertaining to Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl, John Berward of Villingen, Peter of Pulkau, George Wetzel of Horaw, John Angerer of Müldorf and Andrew of Waytra), which I attached in Appendix 3, I concluded that there is a shared strategy of individuation that became more and more manifest within the Vienna Group, culminating in Ebendorfer’s treatment, especially in the case of the debate on the subject of theology (see the illustration of five stages of the second question of the Prologues pertaining to the VGC in Appendix 4).

3. In the third chapter I have examined Ebendorfer's view on the relation between theology, philosophy and logic, focusing also on his stance within the debate on the virtue of speech (virtus sermonis). I have treated these problems by editing and analysing Ebendorfer's first Prologue, in ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4369, ff. 7r-8v, asking „whether in theology, ruler and mistress of all other sciences, can be found a false sentence according to the virtue of speech (virtus sermonis)”. The edition of this text is provided in Appendix 5. More precisely, I have shown that in his first Prologue Ebendorfer combines a twofold conception of theology and philosophy (acquired/infused) with a twofold perspective on the relation between them (temporal/by nature), and makes a strong claim for theology's role in advancing new logical theories – in the first part of his text, and in the second part Ebendorfer deals with the proper boundary between logic and theology, the various senses of biblical terms and the problematic role of logic in interpreting Scripture.

Concerning the first part of Ebendorfer's Prologue I have concluded that his view of the relation between the sciences illustrates a progressive awareness of the distinction between theology and philosophy. Secondly, another important aspect of the first part of Ebendorfer's first prologue is that he proposes a historical perspective through which the relation between theology and philosophy/logic should be judged and makes a strong claim for theology's role in advancing new logical theories. I have concluded that such a historical perspective on the relation between theology, philosophy and logic, espoused by both Ebendorfer's Prologue and the anonymous question in codex Basel, Universitätsbibliothek A-X-44, is only a recent perspective in the historiography of medieval philosophy.

Concerning the second part of Ebendorfer's first Prologue, I have shown that the distinction between theology and philosophy which he discusses in the first part, entails very different applications of virtus sermonis in the two sciences. Even if theology helped logic advance new theories, as Ebendorfer claims, nonetheless one should not let logic define the proper sense of the biblical text, as he concluded in the second part of his text. Moreover, I have shown that doctrines regarding the proper manner of interpreting the biblical text and the proper virtue of its terms (virtus sermonis) along with the distinction between two logics (one of theology, the other of speculative sciences), all of which played a significant part in the condemnations at Constance, were later transferred and appropriated at Vienna, as Ebendorfer's case demonstrates. I have argued that Ebendorfer's view relies specifically in being motivated by the Viennese fifteenth-century intellectual setting where the threat represented by the Hussites had just reached its climax.

4. In chapter 4 I have analysed Ebendorfer's perspective on heterodox religious communities such as the Hussites and the Jews. On the basis of a complete reading of Ebendorfer's commentary, I have attempted to understand not only how the Viennese theologian dealt with heretical tendencies in his text, but also how Jews became scapegoats after being associated with the Hussites and victims of the Wiener Geserah pogrom of 1420-1421.

Regarding the Hussites, I have continued the investigation already opened in the previous chapter asking what other references Ebendorfer makes to the Hussites in his commentary and what is their significance. I have concluded that Ebendorfer's references to the Hussites from his prologues indicate that the problem of heresy—which would later become an important aspect of his life (for instance, in 1433, he participated in the negotiations with the Hussites at the Council of Prague)—is already preoccupying him during his years as a sententiarius. As I have argued, this could be the reason why he decided to approach the subject of virtus sermonis in his first Prologue, thus breaking from the VGC tradition and why he approached a new question in his second Prologue where he updated Scotus' treatment of heresy with references to the Waldensians and the Hussites.

Regarding the Jews, I have investigated the manner in which Viennese theologians attempted to rationalise their ideas and beliefs concerning Jews and Judaism at a very intricate point in history, i.e. in the years surrounding the 'Wiener Geserah' from 1420-1421. I based my analysis on a complete reading of Ebendorfer's commentary on the basis of which I compiled a list of explicit references to Jews and Judaism from Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary (see Appendix 7). I also considered a hitherto unknown fragment attributed to Henry of Langenstein (in ms. Basel, Universitätsbibliothek, A X 44, f. 166v) which sheds new light on his stance concerning the conversion of Jews (see the edition in Appendix 6). In a short note De Iudeis Langenstein takes a step further towards abandoning the moral suasion and apologetics altogether. As I have shown, Langenstein argues that more extreme measures should be taken with the aim of converting Jews, an issue which should be addressed through different means than those pertaining to the sphere of reason, i.e., argumentation and apologetics. This new piece of information should be indicative of the Viennese theologian's attitude towards Jews which was degrading already from 1397.

I also based my investigation on two case studies from Thomas Ebendorfer's Sentences commentary, one regarding the indemonstrability of the Trinity (including the compatibility of Aristotelian logic with Trinitarian doctrine) and the other regarding forced baptism.

Regarding the indemonstrability of the Trinity, I have concluded that towards the beginning of the fifteenth century, a new stage of this polemic is developing in Vienna, where the question of the demonstrability of the Trinity gains a practical dimension due to the presence of a much bigger Jewish community. I have argued that Ebendorfer's case is particularly relevant for understanding how he justifies that a demonstration of the Trinity is impossible to the Jews by appealing to experience (i.e. to the recently forced conversion of Viennese Jews that he witnessed himself and which he related later in his Cronica Austriae).

Concerning the relation between Trinitarian theology and Aristotelian logic, I have shown that Ebendorfer abandoned treating the traditional question of the VGC asking "whether the rules of the philosophers and Aristotle regarding syllogisms are generally sufficient to the Catholics for syllogising in the divine". Hence, his refusal to even include this question in his more mature commentary, possibly under Langenstein's influence, denotes a lack of interest in the issue of solving Trinitarian paralogisms, marking the end of such a debate at Vienna.

Moreover, if one follows Shank's argument that Langenstein might have abandoned his faith in the validity of Aristotelian logic due to its inability to convert Jews, one could also infer that Ebendorfer's dropping of this topic mirrors his lack of confidence in reason's ability to demonstrate the truth of the Trinity, which had to be a conceptual outcome of the 1420-1421 pogrom. His negative stance regarding the validity of Aristotle's logic can be justified by the historical context in a similar way to his post factum justification of the indemonstrability of the Trinity and should be seen as a significant part of the fifteenth century anti-Jewish theology.

Concerning the issue of forced baptism, I have analyzed a question devoted to this issue from an anonymous commentary on Book IV of which Ebendorfer had a copy and which he annotated with great interest (in ms. Wien, ÖNB, 4369, ff. 224r-405v) during his period as a sententiarus and in the same year that the persecutions of Jews took place, i.e. 1421. In responding that everyone who is baptised receives the baptismal grace, this anonymous question continues the VGC tradition of dealing with this subject originating in Dinkelsbühl's Sentences commentary, d. 5. Yet Ebendorfer's marginal notes prove a particular interest in this issue, because he adduces in the margin supplementary quotations from XIIIth and XIVth century theologians, amongst whom Aquinas, Durand, Landulphus and Scotus. As I have argued, Scotus' legitimization of forced conversion of adult infidels could have been used at Vienna in support of the persecutions of the Jewish community, since the Jews, who were accused to be collaborating with the Hussites, were probably being seen as equally threatening to the Christian faith as the Hussites.

It is interesting that Ebendorfer approached the topic of forced baptism of Jewish children in his first Lectura and the general gist of the discussion starkly inclines towards the idea that children of Jews should not be forcibly baptised, but some doubts are already being cast on this conclusion. As the anonymous author remarked, in the case of Jewish serfdom, authors differ in their opinions and one is left wondering to what degree the open character of this question played a part in the theological motivations of the forced baptism of Jews in 1420-1421 at Vienna.

In trying to grasp what mechanisms lie behind Ebendorfer's argumentation and how historical events can have an impact on intellectuals' attitude towards certain topics (such as the indemonstrability of the Trinity), I have shown that Ebendorfer justifies his denial of a rational demonstration of the Trinity precisely based on the previous failed attempts to formulate such an efficient demonstration to the Jews. With this kind of post factum rationalization, the argumentation at Vienna took a circular form: the Jews had to be forcibly baptised because they could not be converted through reason (since the Trinity is not demonstrable), hence making a voluntary conversion impossible, but also – as Ebendorfer ended up claiming – the Trinitarian doctrine is not rationally demonstrable, since experience itself showed that Jews could not be convinced of this truth. The historical reality of 1420-1421, a dark episode motivated by the impossibility of convincing Jews to convert to Christianity by means of reason, thus becomes an argument of authority in proving the very indemonstrability of the Trinity.

A broader conclusion of my thesis is that in order to understand the implications and motivations of major events in the history of the XVth century, such as the two condemnations at the Council of Constance and the persecutions of Jews in 1420-1421, we should look carefully (also) at Sentences commentaries written in Vienna, because the authors of these texts are keen on building mechanisms of legitimizing a certain attitude towards religious alterity. If in the case of the Jews, the weapons of anti-Judaism were old, the confrontation with the Hussites brought to Christians another type of religious enemy, closer to Christianity than Jews, but more dangerous since it soon grew into a greater threat to the Christian unity. Once the two faces of threat were seen as conspiring, the Christian reaction was explosive.

For a Viennese theologian who was in the middle of these events, such as Ebendorfer, the social and religious context has a strong reflection in his Sentences commentary. More precisely, we find in his commentary a defensive strategy that entails the abandonment of any apologetic attempt. This is supported not only by the continuation of traditional attitudes towards Hussites and Jews but also by several instances such as the link between the impossibility of convincing Jews of the Trinity and the indemonstrability of this dogma.

From a larger perspective, Ebendorfer's commentary shows that his major interest was his own identity and less the Other. Regarding the Hussites, the withdrawal of theology is visible from the vigorous defense of the Christian interpretative tradition in understanding the literal sense of the Bible. Regarding the Jews, the propagation of the same traditional loci and prejudices against Jews, even after the Jewish danger was eliminated, proves that Ebendorfer's attitude proceeds from a mechanism of defending his own identity anchored in the Christian path, and, to continue Shank's perspective, Ebendorfer's critique of Aristotelian logic and his lack of confidence in the Aristotelian syllogistic, also suggests an inward focused attitude. The connections I have drawn between Ebendorfer's stance on the indemonstrability of the Trinity and the events concerning Jews that took place in the same period do not describe a causal relation but can be seen rather as "echoes". As E. Marmusztejn put it in a different context: "They can aid in our understanding, but they do not provide an explanation."⁷

The mechanisms of this „internalist theology”, which have been put in action already from 1277 and grew with Rimini according to Courtenay, entails an inwardly focused attitude that is less preoccupied by inter-religious dialogue: "Theology as a tool for defending the faith and converting others was replaced by a more internal and internally consistent theological system."⁸ The same type of theology that leaves little room for the Other seems to have been perpetuated at Vienna provoked by the „extraordinary defensive attitude” that contaminated most Viennese theologians. The academic discourse in Vienna, as Ebendorfer's case showed, is a culmination of this type of theology.

⁷ MARMUSZTEJN, "Uses and Echoes of Visigothic Conciliar Legislation in the Scholastic Controversy on Forced Baptism", p. 57.

⁸ COURTENAY, "Nominalism and Late Medieval Religion," p. 58 (apud WITT, Between Faith and Knowledge, p. 380): "One aspect of this increase in Biblical theology and the Biblical conception of God [which he thinks is characteristic of 'Ockhamism'] is that theology became less apologetic in the process. The apologetic focus of so much of thirteenth century theology—one thinks especially of Raymund Lull, Roger Bacon's Opus Maius, Thomas' Summa contra gentiles and Raymond Martin's Pugio fidei—was designed to convert the Jew and the Moslem and reconvert the heretic. The emergence of a scientific theology that could be rationally demonstrated, a theology that begins with the existence and nature of God, established a common ground for dialogue between Christian and non-Christian. All this began to change in 1277. With the attack of the scientific nature of theology and the limitation of the amount of knowledge of God that could be gained through the unaided reason, theology as a tool for defending the faith and converting others was replaced by a more internal and internally consistent theological system."
